FOOD AID TO DISASTER VICTIMS THROUGH THE DIRECT DISTRIBUTION PROGRAM

Fiscal Year 1958

During fiscal year 1958 the United States Department of Agriculture donated available commodities for relief purposes upon request of local officials in 15 areas stricken by natural disasters. These disasters, consisting of five floods, three heavy snows, two tornadoes, two storms with excessive rain, two fires, and one hurricane, occurred in eleven States and Puerto Rico.

A total of 1.4 million pounds of USDA foods, which cost the Government $194,000 was distributed to about 70,000 people (see Table I). The food supplies were made available to relief organizations through the cooperation of State distributing agencies handling the donation of USDA foods to schools and other eligible outlets.

The periods of emergency during which commodities were distributed ranged from three days to thirteen weeks. The latter period resulted from prolonged interruption of agricultural employment of migratory workers due to excessive rains and freezing in Florida. Distribution at the local level to the victims was primarily under the direction of the American Red Cross, with State and county welfare departments, Civil Defense agencies and the Salvation Army assisting.

In New Mexico, heavy rains made roads impassable, isolating the small village of Llaves. The New Mexico State Department of Public Welfare cooperated with the United States Air Force in airlifting food to the victims. In nine of the disasters, central feeding was accomplished through utilization of school lunchroom facilities; a total of about 24,000 persons received food, prepared in 39 schools. Feeding in homes occurred in seven of the disaster areas.

The victims were offered thirteen different types of foods, consisting of ten surplus agricultural commodities, and three "Section 6" foods originally intended for use only in the National School Lunch Program. Small quantities of the latter group of commodities were offered to victims in Puerto Rico and were replaced by the disaster relief organizations. Flour, cornmeal, rice, cheese, and nonfat dry milk were distributed in greater volume than any other commodities. These items represented approximately 97 percent of the total volume (see Table II).

The sources of the USDA foods were school and institutional storerooms, State distributing agency warehouses, and stocks of the Commodity Credit Corporation. Donated foods released from supplies of distribution outlets within the States and Puerto Rico to meet the emergency relief needs were replaced promptly by the Department wherever it was possible to do so.
